KNOW THE WEATHER

By E. H. Sims

What are the best barometer and wind combinations for fair weather?

If you are an amateur forecaster, these barometer and wind direction readings will allow you to predict good weather:

With a barometer high and rising, or high and steady, or very high and falling only slowly, and wind from the southwest changing to northwest, fair weather (probably for two days) can be forecast.

If the barometer is high and rising rapidly, the fair weather will last only a day and rain may follow.

In the summer, a high barometer, falling slowly, with wind rising out of the east to the southeast, usually means fair weather and light wind. A low glass, falling rapidly, with wind swinging from west, means clearing and cold weather.

If you want to be highly remembered, let someone else say a good word.

Play safe — drive carefully.

Life's Hunger

Lesson for February 5, 1961

JESUS CHRIST could turn stones into bread, if he could somehow start with a boy's lunch and build it into a meal for five thousand men with their wives and children, why did he not keep on doing it? No doubt he could have turned stones into bread; but he never tried to do it. Nobody who was out there in the wilderness the day Jesus fed the five thousand had the least doubt that Jesus' powers were unlimited. No wonder that John tells us they tried to make him king by force . . . But Jesus steadily refused to repeat the miracle. Jesus loved people, but he was not one to do everything he was asked to do. He was not even going to do all the kind things he was asked to do. For surely it would have been a kindness to make life easier for the poverty-stricken people of Galilee? Surely there must have been really hungry people there. You know there were, because we hear of no one crying for cake, or bread with butter (they would have said, olive oil) on it. Just bread, again, and again! But there was no answer. Was Jesus heartless? Had his power failed him?

Hunger For Bread

The hunger for bread is one of the elemental things in life. Quite decided people, once they become really hungry act like savages, det like wild dogs. One would think Jesus would not have rebuked the people for wanting what human beings, living creatures, could help wanting. We were not there so we cannot interview any one and find out for certain just why Jesus spoke as he did; but from certain hints, we can guess. For one thing, he knew that all the people in Galilee who were touched by the great "miracle of the loaves and fishes" had managed somehow to keep alive and going, all their lives up to that day. Some of them were lazier than average, of course, but even a lazy man, if hungry enough, will work. So Jesus knew that what they wanted from him do was not simply to feed them.

The Starved Soul

Jesus, moreover, took this opportunity to impress an idea on the people of Capernaum, an idea which was true but which they were not quite able to swallow. Not only are endless free meals sure to make a man worthless; but even bought-and-paid-for, steady, well balanced diets, can be a drag on the spirit. Life has other hungers. Physical hungers are loud and crude. But there are other hungers whose voice is quiet, hungers dormant, in some lives never making themselves felt at all. These are the higher hungers, if we may call them so, these are the unmet appetites of mind and spirit. When we refer to a man or woman as having lived a "full life" we do not mean that steak was served them for dinner every night. There are appetites that can be cultivated, but if they are not, they may die away. The hunger of the mind for understanding, for sympathy, for peace; the hunger of the soul for God. These can actually be smothered by an abundance of bread.

The Bread of God

Jesus called himself the bread of life, the bread of God. If he could use such a figure of speech, we may make bold to say that desiring the Bread of Life is an acquired taste. Just as an appreciation of beauty, and of the higher forms of love, are acquired tastes for most people, so the taste for the Bread of God has to be awakened. Few persons are born with it. Countless men and women live not only without Christ but not wanting him at all, not feeling lost (as they are) without him. They do not know what they are missing. What will awaken them? An Old Testament poet had it—"O taste and see that the Lord is good!" If those who know Christ and love him will share him, many who now live starved lives without realizing it, will waken to know that their true inner hunger, the hunger of the soul, can be satisfied only by him.
